

Square eyes?

You've probably got a television at home. Maybe two? But how much TV do you watch? And how has TV watching changed over the years? The surveys below look at some of these issues. You can use them to develop your own personal survey. Do not just copy the examples here. But first... some advice about creating good surveys.

What are you trying to find out?

These questions are typical of the questions people might ask. They may give you some ideas for questions of your own.

- How many hours of television does a typical teenager watch during the week?
- Do boys watch the same amount of television as girls?
- Do people with cable TV watch the same amount of television as people who do not have cable?
- When, during the day, do most people watch television?
- How many households have, and use, a video recorder? A DVD player?
- What television did my grandparents watch? When did they get their first television set?

What data do you need to answer your question?

You are going to do a survey - but what questions should you ask?

How many people will you need to ask?

What information about the people do you need to collect? Their age? Their gender (male or female)?

How will you analyse the data and communicate your findings?

If you want to draw graphs and charts you will need data with numbers and scores. Do your questions ask for numbers or words?
